4 common questions about blood work and your pet

Pets can't say how they're feeling—it's usually how they look or act that tells you something is wrong. Blood testing goes a step further, showing us the earliest signs of illness, often before your pet even seems to be sick.

Testing gives us immediate insights that we might not otherwise discover. And treating your pet early can help with a better outcome and lower treatment costs, too.

How does blood work help my pet?

Blood testing can frequently detect illness in your pet before we can see any outward signs of disease. Early detection means earlier prevention and treatment. Testing healthy pets during wellness visits gives us your pet's normal baseline values to compare to later.

What are the tests you'll run on my pet?

We'll routinely perform a complete blood count (CBC) and a complete blood chemistry panel, including electrolytes and urinalysis. The CBC tells us if there is infection, inflammation or anemia. The chemistry panel and electrolytes tell us if your pet's liver, kidneys and pancreas are healthy and performing as they should. A urinalysis tells us if there's infection or inflammation in the urinary tract—a common problem for pets of all ages. A T4 test provides information about your pet's thyroid gland function. This is extremely important because thyroid disease is common in dogs and older cats.

Why is it better to have results right away?
